

Having been raised in the 60s, I am certainly no prude. However, with even the most liberal beliefs regarding what is "decent", the network television programs and commercials that are currently being allowed to air are way out of bounds.

It is impossible to watch 30 minutes of television at any time of day and not be inundated with sex. Watching a commercial about a product that enables you to pounce at the right moment with your potential 4 hour erection is certainly good wholesome family entertainment. Police dramas with the female cops showing off cleavage to their waistline is asinine. The reality shows are so pathetic that I am seriously worried about the people who watch these things. Athletes cussing up a storm either on the field (it's not hard to lip read the F bomb) or during interviews is getting very old.

And don't tell me to change the channel or to turn off the T.V. It's on every channel and during nearly every program. And I like to watch T.V. in my home.

Hopefully, the Superbowl wardrobe failure will move you to action. However that was only one bright spot in a day filled with classy entertainment dealing with limp penises and farting horses.

Sincerely,
Wayne Swann
